

You Owe It To Yourself To See These Fall Suits

MEN'S SUITS change enough each season to make the new styles, waited for with real interest, and when an authoritative showing is made they are viewed with no little consideration. OUR NEW STYLES are ready, and the reputation of the store for providing correct models—the most refined expressions of the new styles—focuses unusual attention upon our display.

Another point worth your consideration is our ability to maintain prices at a reasonable level regardless of circumstances that tend to boost costs and lower values. It is always our policy to offer the best possible value for every dollar spent with us and we leave it to our customers if this season's display does not even exceed those which have gone before.

INCENDIARY FIRE.

An attempt to destroy by fire Thompson & Co's premises in the Eastern District was made yesterday morning between 1 and 2 o'clock. Mr. Sylvester A. Thompson, a senior member of the firm, was called up about 2 a. m. by a man from this side who happened to see the reflection from the flames and informed him that one of his woodsheds was on fire. On arrival at the yard he found smoke to be the fact and after a great deal of hard work managed to subdue and quench the flames. Our Vigilante of the Shield and Boston remained ignorant of the whole matter, notwithstanding the reflection of the flames were quite brilliant, but then it was very early in the morning and tired nature needs repose. Our firemen are indebted to the vigilants for a quiet night's rest. From many surrounding evidences Mr. Thompson is sure it was the work of an incendiary.

THE DEATH OF WELLINGTON

It is a curious coincidence—perhaps more than a coincidence—that three of the greatest military leaders of all time were subject to epileptic attacks. Julius Caesar and Napoleon, as is well known, were victims of the dread disease, and the Duke of Wellington, the conqueror of Napoleon, was attacked late in life and succumbed to the ailment when he was in his eighty-fourth year.

It was sixty-four years ago yesterday, Sept. 14, 1852, that Wellington breathed his last in Walmer Castle, one of the official residences bestowed upon him by a grateful people. It was his habit to spend two months of each autumn in the ancient pile, one of the three castles built by Henry VIII. to defend the low coast near Walmer and Deal. Here the English hero spent most of his time, when not riding or walking, in his bedroom, which served also as his library and study. This little room, having only one window which looked toward the sea, was furnished in an extremely simple style. His iron military bedstead was only three feet wide, and the mattress but three inches thick. He had one coverlet, but no blankets, and one small pillow. The Duke rose at six every morning and walked for a time on the ramparts of the castle. His walking day was apportioned with the utmost regularity, and his guests were compelled to fall in with his mode of life. Even the Queen and the Prince Albert were required to adapt themselves to his schedule when visiting him in the castle. The apartments given them were furnished as simply as the room occupied by the Duke, although it is related that the old warrior made one concession by having a carpenter construct a deal stand for the Prince's room.

The Duke rode and walked as usual on the day prior to his death. On the morning of September 14, 1852, a servant went to call him at the customary hour of six, and, hearing a faint groan, entered the room and found his illustrious master ill. The Duke requested that an apothecary, Mr. Hulke of Deal, be summoned. That gentleman arrived between eight and nine, and found the aged Duke in an epileptic fit, similar to one from which he had suffered some years before. The apothecary returned to Deal to prepare some medicines. In the meantime the epileptic symptoms grew worse, and the Duke's son, Lord Charles Wellesley, sent messages to London, summoning three famous physicians. Two were sent for, and the third arrived too late. During the day the Duke suffered much, and spoke occasionally, but his words were unintelligible. At four o'clock he breathed his last. One son, one daughter-in-law, an apothecary, a physician, and a few servants, were with him in his last hours or days. The news of the hero's death plunged all England into mourning. The magnificent public funeral was one of the greatest tributes to his kind ever paid to a dead warrior. Of the death of Napoleon's conqueror Longfellow wrote:

For in the night, unseen, a single warrior,
In somber harness mailed,
Dreaded of man, and surnamed the Destroyer,
The rampant wall had scaled.

He passed into the chamber of the sleeper,
The dark and silent room;
And as he entered, darker grew and deeper
The silence of the gloom.

Woman Who Fell Off

Car Sues Trolley Co.

To recover for injuries received when she was thrown from a trolley car Theresa McMahon of this city has brought suit against the Connecticut Co. for $5,000. In papers filed in the superior court the plaintiff says she tried to alight from a car at Congress and Main streets September 12, 1915.

While on the running board the car suddenly started, causing the plaintiff to fall. She claims to have suffered a fracture of the upper end of the arm joint. This will permanently disable her, she alleges. The plaintiff is a velvet weaver by trade but her injuries have prevented her from working. Attorney William A. Redden is counsel for the plaintiff.

THE INDUCEMENT FOR ENTERING POLITICS

There is widespread regret that it is so difficult to persuade business and professional men to enter political life. Young men of superior ability and positions are constantly urged to enter political work. Yet still the great majority of men having superior ability and character shun politics.

Politics as a career is certainly not rewarding from the money viewpoint for the average man who is strictly honest. Salaries are low. The man who speaks his own strictly independent convictions is considered "unavailable" by the managers. The ambitious aspirant must know how to make many little despots whom he really despises.

Of course where a man has very superior talents, he should be able to forge his way ahead in spite of bosses and machines. He may be big enough to create his own organization, and appeal to the people for backing against the herd of self-seekers. But the man of average ability who is strictly sincere and honest, finds the odds against him.

This situation places a heavy responsibility for good government on successful business and professional men. The same gifts that gave them power in the business world would make them winning forces in politics. The excuse they give for keeping out of politics is that their business would suffer. Probably it would not suffer nearly so much as they think. And in many cases their prominence in politics would give them advertising of the most valuable kind.

Successful men are too intent on continued pursuit of money. Even if they did public work, they are in no danger of want. They would never regret the time spent in civic service.
